National museum of agriculture

The National Museum of Agriculture may have a rather boring name, but it's actually one of the most modern museums in Prague. It explores agriculture in all its forms, so you'll find exhibits on tractors, traditional fishing, hunting, and even hop growing — essential for Czech beer.

The museum also covers topics like ecology, traditional Czech cuisine, food production, and the importance of water. The museum is interactive and includes play zones, as well as scientific and popular science sections. The building in Prague's Letná district includes a small exhibit with live animals and a rooftop terrace offering panoramic views of the city.

Visiting the museum is a great way to learn about the Czech Republic beyond what you'll find in textbooks or language courses.
